

Easter edition

Welcome to the Easter edition of the Nympsfield News and Advertiser. Inside you will find pieces from all our regulars plus an interesting article from Ian Blair about the old highway that runs through the old highway that runs through the village. Hopefully, there will be plenty to amuse you through the fag end of this second lockdown. Thanks to all our contributors and if there's something you would like to say, get in touch!

With more and more people vaccinated we can expect the number of infections to continue falling, giving us the prospect of a return, hopefully, to some semblance of normality. Much depends though on how the virus will change through the year – the normal course would be for it to become more infectious but less deadly. But who knows? The only certain thing is that it will be important to continue with masks. hand hygiene and social distancing for some time yet. Keep safe!

OLD NEWS FROM NYMPSFIELD Dieback Diversion

You are probably not getting out a lot – Dean Martin had it nailed: "Don't get around much anymore" – but you may have happened past the top of Frocester Hill and noticed the aftermath of another disease that can spread rapidly: ash dieback. The old guarry there, long since taken over by weed ash to create a sylvan glade, is now completely bare - nothing but stumps. The National Trust has been busy with chain saws and all the ash has been removed. A notice there says that they intend to replant the area with a mixture of small trees and shrubs. Meanwhile the footpath, part of the Cotswold Way, is diverted.

Like the National Trust at Frocester Hill, the National Arboretum at Westonbirt has also been busy: they recently clear-felled six hectares of Silk Wood, an ancient woodland, bringing in a massive tree harvester to do the work. This beast of a machine can delimb and fell a tree and then cut it into sections in minutes. The work was done, they say, for safety sake and also to preserve the arboretum for the future. At first hearing that sounds odd – chopping down trees to keep the arboretum going – but they say that, if they'd left the trees standing, there would have been six hectares of dead, leafless trees and the extra light would have allowed the brambles to take over. But wouldn't the trees have got the better of the brambles eventually? Sounds like they found the right answer with the wrong argument. Surely the main reason is that this is an arboretum: a tree collection made for people's enjoyment. A re-wilding experiment would have been interesting but it's not what an arboretum is for.

Sadly there is no cure for ash dieback which is caused by a fungus that reproduces through the summer on last year's fallen leaves and spreads on the wind to infect and grow on new trees, cutting off their water supply; when the affected leaves fall off, the cycle begins again. It came to this country from the continent about six years ago and it's reckoned that 90% of our ash trees could fall victim.

With the trees gone at the old Frocester Hill quarry, its structure is more obvious than before. One can see that the quarrymen dug a deep hole right beside (conveniently close to) the road as it approaches the top of the hill. And the many spoil heaps are also more clearly seen. All in all it's probable that the quarry now looks more like it did when it was being worked. Incidentally, the presence of spoil heaps all the way from the crossroads to the Coaley Peak viewpoint indicates that the whole of this length of the Cotswold Edge must have been quarried at some time.

Close to the viewpoint the quarry face is small while the heaps are tiny and grassed over – there are lots of wild flowers in the spring and summer. That suggests that quarrying here happened long ago. Further towards the crossroads, though, the quarry face is higher, there is less vegetation and the spoil heaps are bigger, indicating more recent activity. Comparing different editions of the large scale OS map shows that the quarry expanded in size between 1881 and 1901 but not after. On the other hand the 1924 edition shows it as "quarry", not "old quarry" meaning (probably) that it was still working. On site, I found the stumps of four largish trees that had been growing close to the face. Reasoning that these postdate guarrying – otherwise they would have got in the way of the work -- the number of annual rings on them should give an estimate of when the quarry was abandoned. None of the trees was more than ninety years old which suggests that the guarry was still in operation to about 1930. That roughly ties in with the 1924 map but, if you know any better, please let me know.

Ian Crossland

The Highway through Nympsfield

In 1777, a surveyor called Isaac Taylor produced the first large scale map of Gloucestershire of about one inch to a mile. This he sold to the public at large for £1-4 shilling a copy. On that map he depicted a road through the centre of Nympsfield in the same way as he depicted other roads known to have been important routes (vis the turnpike road from Gloucester to Bristol, now the A38). Heading north, the Nympsfield ran down what is now Blackberry Lane and then straight through the middle of the village out past Stonehill to Buckholt. It then made a steep and twisting descent of the escarpment through woodland before emerging near the bottom of what is now Frocester Hill. From there it went on to join the Gloucester turnpike at Claypits. As will be seen, it formed the chief line of communication between Bath and Gloucester. There was no shorter or better means of travelling between the two cities in 1777, even though the section down the escarpment, which is now a bridlepath, was narrow and with a poor surface.

Luckily there is a wealth of contemporary evidence to confirm the existence of this "main road" through Nympsfield.

In 1698, an intrepid lady called Celia Fiennes made a tour of England on horseback during which she travelled from Gloucester to Bath. She wrote in her diary that, having left Gloucester, she "came to Nymphsffield after having ascended a very steep, narrow and stony hill; 10 mile to Nympsfield and all bad way". She then passed through Cold Harbour (Kingscote) before getting to Bath via Lansdown.

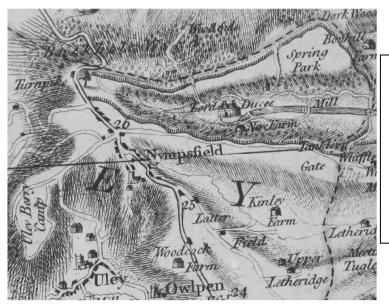

According to Samuel Rudder in his book "A New History of Gloucestershire" written in 1799, the section down the escarpment, called Nympsfield Hill, had been the scene, one dark night, of a little drama in the English civil war. In 1649, a royalist officer called Edward Massey, having been captured at Symondshall, was being escorted to Gloucester down the steep incline, when he "tumbled himself" form his horse, together with the trooper riding behind him on the same horse, and managed to escape into the wood.

Smyth of Nibley, the historian of the Berkeley family, writing in 1639 about

"Nimesfeild" in the Hundred of Berkeley related how "every Thursday in the year, at fower of the clock in the afternoon, for one hour only, Ryppiers, bring south sea fish in their passage to the cities of Glouc and Worcester" stopped at a common inne in this village" to refresh themselves and their horses, which "added fame thereto". [Ed: A ryppier was a fishmonger]

It was only in the 1780s that the road now known as Frocester Hill was constructed. At the same time a new road was built through what is now Cockadilly to link up the top of Frocester Hill with the top of Blackberry Lane. Hence its name today of Bath Road. The whole undertaking was described in a notice which appeared in the Gloucester Journal of 16th February 1784 as "a new and judicious cut which avoids the village of Nympsfield" and which rendered the climb up the escarpment which had "occasioned inconveniences and Delays to travellers on account of its steepness, quite easy and pleasant".

So Nympsfield eventually got its bypass and the steep way through the woods, so disliked by travellers like Celia Fiennes, was abandoned. History does not relate whether all the villagers at the time were pleased or whether some lamented the loss of trade which would have resulted.

Nature Notes from Miss Daisy

"AS MAD AS A MARCH HARE"

We have all heard the phrase "as mad as a March hare" but do you know why hares go "mad" in March?

This is the main month of their breeding season and if you are lucky you will see brown hares standing on their hind legs, engaged in a furious boxing match. It is not normally (as you might expect) that two males are fighting over a female, but it is usually a female hare (fed up with a persistent male's advances) who starts the fight.

Sadly, like so many of our native wildlife species, brown hares have decreased by 80% in the last century, due to loss of habitat through changes in agriculture and by hunting. Hare coursing was once considered a sport, using greyhounds and lurchers, not simply to kill the hare, but to prove the racing prowess of the dog. Whilst both hunter and hunted can run extremely fast, bets were placed on how many times the dog would "turn" the hare, as the hare has a unique ability to change its course of direction, whilst still running at 45 mph. Even with this ability to escape capture, many hares were of course killed or injured and hare coursing is now illegal in England, Scotland and Wales, although it is still a legal sport in other parts of the world.

Hares are of course related to rabbits, but with much larger ears and longer and more powerful hind feet. Unlike rabbits who are gregarious, they live a solitary existence, or just in pairs. Their young are able to fend for themselves shortly after birth, whereas baby rabbits are born blind and helpless.

If you would like to see hares engaged in a boxing match, then this is the month to try and spot them. The best time is either at dawn, or at dusk, in open fields, and edges of woodland.

"As mad as a March hare" has been part of our vocabulary since the 16th century, but it was Lewis Carroll who popularised it in more recent times. His famous book 'The Adventures of Alice in Wonderland' (published in 1865) featured the March hare as a very memorable character.

When you got out "hare spotting" do please take a camera with you – I, for one, would love to see a picture of a "boxing match".

Poem of the Issue

As I rush from task to task Sometimes I should stop and ask? Where are the people that I knew The ones beside me as I grew. The teachers at my various schools Who taught me to obey their rules The ones who taught me right from wrong Who shared my sorrow and my song The friends who often rang quite late Just to say, "How are you mate?" All the people in my life The young girl who became my wife

Some no longer live on earth But I hope they realised their worth Some are here close by my side But others scattered far and wide But where'ere they are, where'ere they be They are the people who shaped ME. So sometimes in my busy day I should make time to stop and say.... THANK YOU

WASTELINES

TEA – after water, the most consumed beverage in the world! 75% of tea is grown in China, India, Kenya and Sri Lanka, the rest coming from many smaller producers all around the world, including England, at Tregothnan, Cornwall, where tea was first planted in 1999.

But what has tea got to do with waste?

First there is the waste created in the tea production industry. But the good news here is that there is increasing interest in not wasting the waste, for example tea can be used to make fertiliser/compost, for dying fabrics and paints, and more recently, for 'adsorbing', or removing, heavy metals which have been spilled into rivers and lakes.

And second is the issue of teabags... nearly all teabags are made of paper, but most still also contain a strip of plastic which, when heated, seals the bag. Most of these plastics do not degrade fully but break down into nano-sized pieces which will be around forever. Also, tiny fragments of plastic are known to be released into our cup of tea when we pour boiling water over the bag...the worst teabags for this being the polyester pyramid bags, for obvious reasons. Gradually more brands are promising to change to other, plantbased materials to seal the teabags. However, most 'bioplastics' can only be broken down in industrial composters, and it's likely that in practice teabags will end up in landfill or maybe on our home compost heaps where the plastic will never fully break down.

So what to do? We can check on whether our favourite brand of teabags contain plastic, and if we find they do we can email the company to put on the pressure for change. And/or we can buy only brands which don't contain plastic. Or we can switch to loose tea brewed in teapots or with a tea-infuser. By the way, the main difference between loose leaf tea and bagged tea is the grade of the tea: teabags use 'fannings', aka 'dust', whereas loose leaf teas use the whole tea leaf and can be used at least twice without impairing or weakening the flavour. So, the biggest plastic-free brands around at the moment are: PG Tips, Clipper, and Pukka Herbs.

Which means that the other major brands almost certainly still use plastic and so need a kick up the oompah to mend their ways!

A

From the Village Hall Committee

We were very lucky, after such a difficult year, that Santa was able to travel to Nympsfield and drive around the village as usual on Christmas Eve to say hello to all the children. Thank you for coming, Santa, it was lovely to see you again this year.

Santa's Little Helpers turned out, as usual, and we'd like to say a huge Thank You to everyone who came and collected for us, both Committee members and non-Committee members, and to everyone who kindly donated (from a safe distance). You were all very generous this year and we collected a whopping £400.30 (and a few American cents) for the benefit of the Village Hall.

From Winnie Morgan (19 Dec 2020)

What a privilege to be invited to the Convent to witness the reception of eight postulants to come into the novitiate. The singing and music transported you to Africa, it was amazing. The voices singing were absolutely wonderful. When we are again allowed to sing in church with the nuns' voices it will be excellent. To witness eight lovely young women singing and dancing down the aisle of the chapel was unbelievable. Thank goodness I went. See picture on previous page.

NYMPSFIELD PARISH COUNCIL

Parish Council meetings continue to be held electronically via Zoom.

Points of discussion included the installation of village green gates and the installation of "white gates" at Cockadilly. Progress continues to be hampered by lockdown.

Recent planning developments have included a proposal to replace the mobile phone mast on Tinkley Lane with a considerably larger one. This is proposed by the Vodafone/O2 joint initiative to roll out 5G coverage. A meeting was held with our MP Siobhan Baillie, wherein concerns were expressed about the physical impact, location and questionable benefit to Nympsfield residents, many of whom may not be Vodafone or O2 customers. A decision whether or not to oppose the application has not yet been taken.

Stroud Planning are investigating the recently appeared field access, next door to Bell Court and opposite Springland.

The general state of roads and drains within Nympsfield has been raised with Gloucestershire Highways department.

Covid Testing - Stratford Park car park is to be the site of a new, 7 days a week testing facility, with a scheduled opening of the 27th February. It will be in situ for a minimum period of three months. The mobile unit will continue but will be re-sited to a location in Stonehouse, to be specified. These above are intended for people showing symptoms. Testing for people with no symptoms continues to be available at the walk-in rapid testing site in Gloucester.

Meetings are usually held the 2nd Monday in the month at 19.30 in the Village Hall. However, in the current circumstances, all meetings are now held "remotely". Please visit our website www.nympsfieldparishcouncil.org to view the Agenda and Minutes of all meetings.
